The establishment has a self-composting machine that transforms all the organic waste generated by the Restaurant into compost, which is subsequently used to nourish public gardens. It is the first restaurant in the mountain area of Madrid to have this technology.

The mentioned machine, Bighanna technology from Sweden, processes about 35 -40 kilos per day, approximately 1,200 kilos per month, and the complete cycle of processing the waste into compost lasts about three weeks.

It is a completely natural process that does not carry any external additives, but is based on the fermentation of the products itself.
